

THE CLIENT OF THE FUTURE

How audit firms need to change the way they work and market their services

Twenty years ago an audit firm could have differentiated itself on the basis of its product, but in today's world it's become easier to replicate service quality and customer experience, so any advantage you create is short-lived. Differentiation today also depends on our vision of what the audit of tomorrow will look like.

OUR STARTING POINT

Audit is—inherently, inevitably, and undeniably—a conservative business.

A process that's been built up over decades; that's been adjusted to crises and other, more gentle market changes; and that's dependent on the ability to analyse data over time, isn't something anyone wants to reinvent overnight.

Yet the same forces that have kept the audit within a narrow evolutionary path, have also resulted in a market where differentiation is so difficult that regulators have to intervene to force clients to change auditors, and where manual processing persists long after it's been automated in other industries. Audit firms themselves suspect they're living on borrowed time. Digital technology has disrupted many industries: surely it's only a matter of time before it changes audit, too?

To help answer this question, we surveyed 200 senior executives in US corporations, all of whom were, in some capacity, involved in the audit process—details of which can be found on page 7.

This report has been written for audit firms, but not by auditors. Instead, we've applied the expert understanding we've developed about the consulting industry to the audit world, in order to take an outside-in view of the way the audit market may develop in the future.

OUR METHODOLOGY AND RESEARCH SAMPLE

We surveyed 200 senior executives in US organisations in January 2017.

Respondents came from a range of different sectors, although we skewed the sample towards financial services (25% of the total), because this is such a crucial market for the professional services sector.

All were senior executives, including 71% at CXO level. Thirty-four percent of the sample came from the finance function. All had direct involvement with their auditors: 77% were involved in selecting them.

Eighty-percent of respondents had either put their external audit out to tender in the last 12 months, or were expecting to do so in the next 12 months. The reason for putting the audit out to tender varied. Just over a third of respondents said they did so as part of a standard rotation process, and a further 22% did so because audit regulations forced them to change. Other reasons were specific to the organisation and included on-going strategic changes, conflicts of interest, or because they weren't happy with their current auditor.
