Our global data model is the biggest and most sophisticated model of the professional services industry available. It provides data on market size, growth rates, and forecasts across 29 industries, 12 service lines, 84 countries, and five firm types. It's the platform on which a growing number of professional services firms are basing their understanding of the market and their performance within it.

Introduction

The COVID-19 pandemic has changed our lives, our communities, the global economy, and the consulting market, and its impact is likely to be felt for some considerable time to come. Against this backdrop, we wanted to develop a report that is as useful as possible in understanding the immediate impacts of the crisis while helping firms navigate a way forward.

Once the recovery starts, clients' needs will be dictated by the needs that were already there, coloured by recent events. Therefore, understanding both the situation before the crisis and the things that are changing right now will be essential for firms to support clients through the recovery. With this in mind, this report includes the following:

- In-depth analysis of the consulting market in 2019, including key trends and analysis of demand by sector and service
- A look at how COVID-19 is changing the market currently and an assessment of the sectors and services most likely to experience demand once the situation improves
- Commentary around how firms will need to change what they do and how they do it in order to meet client expectations in a changed landscape
- A link to our latest forecasts for 2020

We have drawn on a number of data sources in order to develop our analysis:

- We've built a bottom-up model of the global consulting market from the information we get from consulting firms and our own research, and we use this to size the industry and its growth rates. This is based on our global model, which contains detailed data about almost 1,600 firms plus higher-level estimates about a further 400,000 firms, all with more than 50 consultants apiece, in addition to comprehensive primary research carried out by Source analysts.
- We're very grateful for the input of a wide range of firms, who are helping us assess the impact of COVID-19 on the market by providing up-to-the-minute information that we are using on an ongoing basis to adjust our existing model of the industry.
- We also carried out two client surveys to help us build a rich picture of how different trends in France are affecting clients' organisations and their use of consulting, covering:
 - how clients expect to use consultants over 2020 and into 2021
 - factors that affect how clients work with consulting firms
 - the ways consulting firms market themselves to clients and the impact this has on client decision making.

Although these surveys were completed prior to the COVID-19 outbreak, this gives us some insight into clients' priorities going into the crisis.

The France consulting market in 2019

Overview

2019 was a good year for the consulting market in France, which saw solid growth of 6.2%, taking the market to a value of €5,162m. True, growth wasn't quite as high as in 2018, when there was a market uptick of almost 7%, but given concerns going into the year about the potentially damaging impacts of domestic and international political and economic uncertainty, it was a better year than many had hoped for.

What kept the market relatively buoyant was clients' strong appetite for help with full-scale, technology-driven business transformation, particularly in heavily disrupted sectors, including financial services and retail—an appetite that benefited firms most able to convince clients of their ability to deliver tangible and relevant digital solutions.

We have continued to see strong demand for end-to-end consulting, and this model is constantly finding new markets, as demand is pushed further away from the traditional consulting model.

Romain Delavenne, Niji

The market is still growing at a similar speed to previous years. However, the mix of projects has changed a bit, with more work with B2C companies.

Kai Bandilla, Simon-Kucher & Partners

However, it wasn't a good year for every firm. Macroeconomic and political concerns put some major multinationals in a cautious mood, reluctant to make big decisions and embark on major spending programmes. Pressure to cut costs in the face of widespread disruption and competitive pressures also impacted the consulting budgets of a range of clients. Strike action protesting against government reforms at the end of 2019 was a further disruption that impacted client enthusiasm for spend—though many saw this as less disruptive than the gilets jaunes protests at the end of 2018. One factor that did help the market stabilise toward the end of the year was greater certainty about the shape and timing of Brexit, and there was a sense that the market heaved a collective sigh of relief as the situation finally crystallised.

Overall, 2019 was an okay year, but at the same time it was quite volatile compared to previous years—it was probably a touch less positive than 2018. It's a reflection of the lack of dynamism and direction at a global level for the French economy. All of this together—plus the strikes, which have affected the market—meant there were quite a lot of variables depending on which sector you look at.

Arnaud Sergent, L.E.K.

The strikes in France are having an impact, to some extent, on the consulting market. The optimism that we had at the beginning of Macron's mandate is no longer there. I don't quite mean the business mood or mindset is pessimistic, but we're moving forward with a general feeling that we've lost our national cohesion and that our country will continue to resist change. Nobody knows where we go from here. Companies can't see the light at the end of the tunnel, meaning they don't quite know what direction to invest in. It's a shame the energy isn't being channelled into constructive discussions that could move us forward.

Bernard Drui, Protiviti

Brexit has had a real but limited impact on consulting spend because of the uncertainty: The big clients are waiting as long as possible. Financial services clients have started to think about this, but we think a bigger impact is starting to come now as there's more certainty about what's at stake.

Christophe Desgranges, PwC

There's not been an impact from the strikes in terms of the amount of work. From a more practical perspective, however, there was an impact on logistics that led to cancellations of meetings, travel problems, and so on. However, French clients aren't in a wait-and-see situation because of the strikes—it hasn't impacted their strategic decisions.

Robert Maroncelli, EFESO

Four things that changed in 2019

- 1 Growth slows: While the France consulting market continued to expand at a healthy rate in 2019, consulting growth slowed across most sectors as compared to 2018. While there were many factors at play, the reduced growth was largely attributable to a general slowing of the economy and a nagging suspicion that, after a run of good years, things were about to get worse. Now that they most emphatically have gotten worse, we wonder if 2019's relative conservatism might leave clients and firms better prepared than they would be if the pandemic had interrupted a booming market.
- 2 Brexit moves forward: After years of uncertainty, doubts about whether Brexit would ever happen were finally put to bed in 2019. Whether they welcome or scorn the UK's divorce from the EU, France's clients were at least relieved to have some clarity, and those determined to delay decision making until matters were settled finally got a chance to start working on their plans for the post-Brexit world towards the end of the year.
- 3 Digital as a change agent: As clients become ever more sophisticated digital buyers, they're increasingly approaching consultants for help exploring how digital solutions might be used to solve a specific problem or achieve a particular goal, rather than simply approaching firms with a new technology they'd like to implement. It's a great opportunity for consultants who have the combination of vision and technical know-how needed for true innovation. As the market emerges from the current crisis, it will be an even better opportunity for consultants with the creativity to deliver innovation on a budget.
- 4 Sustainability comes to the fore: Though not new to the agenda, sustainability initiatives seemed to turn a corner last year, as many clients have decided that greenwashing and environmentally friendly gestures are no longer enough. As clients look for support changing the very way they conduct business, it's possible that we'll see the digital transformation revolution soon followed by a sustainability transformation revolution.
